

Study finds a need to focus on broad control measures that will be effective for all organisms.

Infectious Disease News - October -2002

“Studies indicate that the preemptive use of barrier precautions is highly effective at preventing the spread of multidrug resistant organisms. “Objects in the hospital environment also appear to play a significant role in the transmission of resistant pathogens,” Maki said. Using stethoscopes... on multiple patients increases the risk of transmission.”